To describe the five-year experience with a vacuum-assisted closure (VAC) device for the treatment of chronic wounds at a single institution. We retrospectively reviewed our five-year experience with 17 consecutive patients who received a VAC for chronic wounds. Mean age was 65 years, and 12/17 (70%) had diabetes mellitus as the underlying cause of their wound. All patients had failed standard wound care. Baseline characteristics and presenting wounds were noted. Mean duration of VAC use was 383 days and, on follow-up, none of the patients required replacement of the VAC device. Mean wound size at study entry was 11.8 cm(2) and decreased to 3.2 cm(2) at the time of wound healing and 1.1 cm(2) at the time of VAC removal. One patient had evidence of osteomyelitis at the time of VAC removal. There were two deaths during the five-year period. Patients with wounds that failed standard wound care were successfully treated with a VAC device for an average of 383 days. No VAC device failures occurred after removal. The mean decrease in wound area during VAC therapy was 84.5%. The VAC can be safely removed without subsequent disease recurrence, is associated with a high patient satisfaction rate, and has a low complication rate. In 19 women with essential hypertension pregnant and in 16 controls, plasma norepinephrine (NE) levels were measured and systemic and pulmonary vascular resistance were evaluated by means of echocardiographic methods. Maternal NE levels during pregnancy were significantly higher than in controls. However in hypertensive patients plasma NE levels were similar in the first trimester and in the third, and the levels did not change throughout pregnancy. During pregnancy, systemic vascular resistance was significantly higher in hypertensive women than in controls. Since the pulmonary vascular resistance did not differ from controls in either group, these results suggest that in hypertensive women, NE may not be released in adequate amounts to compensate for the increase in afterload. The deep coma experienced by victims of traumatic brain injury (TBI) is often complicated by the presence of seizures. In some TBI patients, seizures occur spontaneously, in others they are triggered by stimuli, and in others they are both spontaneous and triggered. In order to develop treatments that both prevent and treat spontaneous seizures, it is necessary to understand the mechanisms by which seizures develop and how they are terminated. The long term goal of this research project is to understand how seizures evolve and then terminate. The objective of this application is to develop a better understanding of the mechanisms by which seizures terminate. It is known that in most cases of TBI, the brain has the capacity to resume normal behavior and function following the initial injury. One of the most common types of spontaneous seizures observed in patients with TBI is activity generated in the cortex and thalamus as the post-TBI brain gradually responds to a new post-injury environment. It has been proposed that spontaneous activity that results from cortical and thalamic injury is "unmasked" by post-TBI brain injury that is itself epileptogenic and that the spontaneously-evoked seizures may serve to protect the brain by terminating physiological activity in cortex and thalamus in favor of more adaptive behavior.
