Global Warming The establishment by humans of physical or social environmental constraints on the earth's biosphere that create unacceptable risks of harm to future generations. In this definition, global warming refers to the warming of the earth's climate system, as a consequence of the accumulation of Greenhouse gases (GHG) in the atmosphere. Greenhouse gases are gases that trap heat in the earth's atmosphere, and include methane, water vapor, nitrous oxide, and ozone. Sulfates, chlorofluorocarbons, chlorofluorocarbons, and stratospheric ozone are gases that were previously included as greenhouse gases, but were found to not actually "trap heat in the earth's atmosphere." Stratospheric ozone is not seen as a significant contributor to global warming, but is still mentioned in this article. Fractionated radiotherapy requires a high-resolution target volume imaging device to distinguish between the individual radiation dose deposits. The volume of the scintillator detector is a major concern in designing a high-resolution detector. The theory of longitudinal scattering of light in the scintillator and the skin has been developed to facilitate the design of a high-resolution detector. A theoretical calculation was performed using the Monte Carlo program, MCNPX to determine the effect of the scintillator volume on the skin dose response function of the detector. This relationship was applied to a 4x4 mm(2) detector geometry and the effect was incorporated into a Monte Carlo modeling study. The results show that the net skin dose response function is within  $\pm 5\%$  of the ideal dose response function for a 1.6 mm<sup>3</sup> scintillator volume. A scintillator volume f678ea9f9e
